BIOPHILIC FEATURE · CASE STUDY

The Boulder Chandelier

A double-height living space, eight metres of empty wall, and a brief that resisted the obvious answer. Rather than fill the wall, Green Zen filled the air — a suspended cluster of sculptural boulders, hovering weightless above the room.

THE BRIEF

The residence's main living area rose the full height of two floors. A single feature wall dominated the room — too tall for art, too prominent to leave bare. The owners wanted a focal point with presence and calm, in keeping with a pared-back, natural interior of cream tones, marble and greenery.

THE RESPONSE

Green Zen proposed working with the volume rather than the wall. A composition of three sculptural stone forms — convincingly rock in texture and tone, yet feather-light — was suspended on fine cable to float at varying heights, drawing the eye upward and animating the space without crowding it.

FROM BARE WALL TO FLOATING LANDSCAPE

Concept, craft & outcome

01 · BEFORE
A blank double-height wall awaiting a focal point.

02 · THE CRAFT
Each form individually rigged and balanced at height.

03 · THE MATERIAL
Sculpted stone texture with the weight engineered out.

APPROACH

Working from the room's proportions, each boulder was positioned to read as a natural cluster — asymmetric, unforced, and balanced against the sofa and glazing below. Suspension points were concealed so the forms appear to hover unsupported.

DELIVERED

- Bespoke sculptural stone forms, lightweight build
- Concealed cable suspension at varied heights
- On-site rigging and balancing at full ceiling height
- Clean handover — zero maintenance, no irrigation

> "Biophilic design isn't always green. Sometimes it's the raw language of the landscape, brought indoors — weight, made weightless."
